The groups are challenging the constitutionality of the Department of Homeland Security's (DHS) "Secure

Communities" program, which was supposed to be fully operational by 2011, but which the DHS delayed in order to deal with a lawsuit brought by advocacy group MALDEF. Responses to the lawsuits filed yesterday say the plaintiffs have no case on which to sue. The Secure Communities program has been challenged in three lawsuits filed in U.S. District Courts in California, Illinois, and New York. In the three cases, plaintiffs allege that the program discriminates against immigrants, and that DHS denies its immigrants' Fifth Amendment right to due process. DHS's response argues that the third-party fingerprint database is built on the proper standards of due process, with the court's review of the agencies' actions. The organizations said that after DHS released a new statement in January of 2011, stating that the Secure Communities program was only an "interim" measure, the agency did not release it to the media, but to inside government only. "On January 26, 2011, DHS-ICE issued a new notice that the Legal Memorandum Directive, which governs the practice of detaining individuals solely for the purpose of transferring that information to N-Files, remains in effect," DHS's response reads. A statement by the Obama administration says the Secure Communities program "has been fully operational since June of 2011." The statement says that DHS "is committed to ensuring that every immigration officer has the appropriate tools to effectively carry out their mission." The statement says that the status of the program is a federal issue and not a state issue. DHS notes that the California court, by ruling on a procedural dispute, concluded that DHS may not continue to detain and transfer an individual when federal guidelines and laws say the individual is only supposed to be detained for the purpose of receiving an interview. "Should an eligible individual of whom DHS learns that they qualify for removal but before removal they are subsequently released from detention under the program, and later becomes subject to either DHS's authority under § 1225(50b96ab0b6
